The History of Delaware

"Delaware is like a diamond, diminutive, but having within it inherent value," a Delaware poet, John Lofland, wrote more than one hundred years ago. This was perhaps the origin of Delaware's "nickname," The Diamond State, although it may have come from Thomas Jefferson's earlier reference to Delaware as "a jewel among the States."

One of the original thirteen colonies and "The First State" by virtue of being the first state to adopt the Constitution (December 7, 1787), Delaware has made notable contributions to the history and progress of the United States.

The state derived its name from Lord De La Warr, an early governor of the Colony of Virginia, when Captain Samuel Argall named the bay and the river after his patron during a visit to the area in either 1610 or 1611. The first attempt at colonization, made by the Dutch near present-day Lewes, in 1631, was subsequently destroyed by Indians.

Swedish colonists, under Peter Minuit, established the first permanent settlement in 1638 on a site now a part of Wilmington. In 1655, The Dutch, who four years previously had settled at present-day New Castle, extended their holdings to include the Swedish settlements. What is now Delaware later became a British colonial possession

(as part of the Province of Pennsylvania) and remained so until 1776 when the "Three Lower Counties on the Delaware" became "The Delaware State."

The valor of the state's fighting men in the American Revolution matched that of their mascots—gamecocks—hatched from the eggs of a famous Blue Hen. As a result, Delawareans became known as the "Blue Hen's Chickens." Only one Revolutionary War Skirmish was fought on Delaware soil — September 3, 1777 — at Cooch's Bridge; here, the American flag was first displayed in land battle.

Delawareans have distinguished themselves in both war and peace. The State's contributions, in men and materials, have been notable in all this Nation's wars.

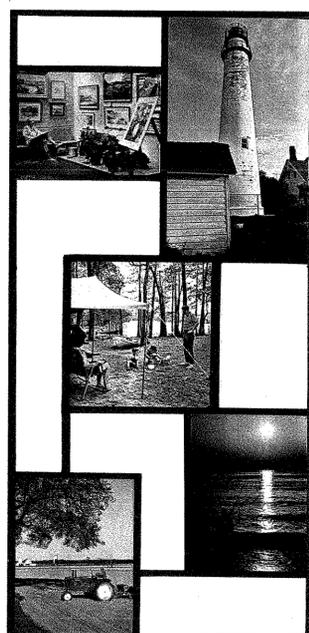

The level fertile coastal plain area comprising much of Delaware's 2,057 square miles (of which 79 square miles is inland water) has always produced an abundance and variety of vegetable, grains, and fruit. In 1895, in recognition of Delaware's then outstanding fruit production, the peach blossom was adopted as the state flower. In recent years, Delaware farmers have turned to the lucrative production of broiler and truck crops.

The Wilmington area, with its abundant water power and proximity to Northern markets, early became the site of flour mills, to which were added powder mills in 1802, and textile mills in mid-1800's. From these small beginnings sprang Delaware's greatest industries of today.

While Kent and Sussex Counties are still basically agrarian, Delaware's industrial growth has, in recent years bordered on the spectacular and has greatly influenced its economy, giving Delaware an unusually high per capita income.

Equally spectacular has been Delaware's population growth; since 1950, the population has increased from 318,085 (official U. S. census) to 446,292 (1960 census) making Delaware one of the fastest growing states, percentage-wise, in the nation.

Delaware's schools are keeping pace with the state's growth. Its highways are among the best in the nation. Its recreational facilities are being constantly improved. Its soil is productive, the climate is mild, and its people are industrious and adaptable. Its economy shows a good sense of balance between industry and agriculture. All of which combines to assure a most promising future for Delaware and its citizens.
